Claustrophilia is the approved medical term for a desire to be held in confined spaces, usually for sexual gratification. Sexual arousal may be associated with lying in a coffin or some sort of box or even a wearing a straight jacket. Treatment is generally not sought unless the condition becomes problematic for the person. The majority of people simply learn to accept their fetish and manage to achieve gratification in an appropriate manner.

Viktor Oszvald is founder of Claustrophilia (claustrophilia.hu), TripAdvisor's top-ranked thing to do in Budapest, and part of a tourist craze sweeping Europe : room escape games. The games combine riddles and physical tasks, with the aim being to escape from a room. Claustrophilia is one of the 30 escape games to crop up in Budapest since the first, ParaPark arriving three years back. Other influences include TV shows like Survivor.

Escape games have flourished in Budapest, thanks to an abundance of dilapidated apartment blocks that owe much to a violent, tragic past. There are around 50 room-escape games scattered throughout the Hungarian capital, a live-action video games. Claustrophilia turned out to be a real job. His founder hopes to expand his escape "empire" to new cities. He even went to New York to meet with potential investors.
